MISS MANGAN,
Alliance, Nebr.

Notice to Farmers.

In going over the B. & M. in the central and western part of the state I note an unfavorable condition in a large percent of the wheat and oat fields, caused by the heavy rains in the early part of May. The surface is packed and crusted, and spots of a greater or less magnitude in nearly all fields have a light green color, and the leaves are narrow and point straight up. While the drying out by evaporation has much to do with this, there is another trouble; the lack of air, which is shut out by this crust. The pores of this crust are daily being made smaller by the upward movement of the magnesia salts and alkalis. These are being brought to the surface by the moisture, which is, under this condition, fast escaping.

WHEN AND HOW TO HARROW.

Don't get into grain that is six or more inches high when the dew is on. Wait just long enough in the morning for the blades to dry off—and no longer. Set the teeth slightly slanting, not too much, and as a rule harrow crosswise of the rows. Break the surface thoroughly. Grain that is six inches high or over, thick, with good width of blades and of good color, needs no harrowing. If this advice seems too radical, then just try a part of your field, even a small part, and in two weeks be kind enough to report to me the results. Yours for better crops, H. W. Campbell, Lincoln, Nebr.

STUDENT SCORED AT END.

Professor's Discomfiture at Hands of Smart Undergraduate.

John Morley was talking in New York about Prof. Jowett.

"The famous and learned Master of Balliol," he said, "had a caustic wit, and innumerable are the stories of undergraduate's discomfiture that his acid sentences occasioned. Stories of Jowett's discomfiture at an undergraduate's hands are rare. Nevertheless I heard one recently.

"A youth from Devonshire entered Oxford, called on Prof. Jowett duly, and on a certain afternoon took a walk with the great man along the river bank.

"He was a talkative youth. He gave over the whole afternoon to a discussion of Jowett's work on Plato. He pointed out two phrases in Jowett's Symposium and Republic that he conceived to be errors of translation, and he found some little fault with the notes. Prof. Jowett, he held, did not give in these notes a quite adequate exposition of the Platonic philosophy.

"For nearly two hours Prof. Jowett listened to this boy's criticism of his life work. Save for the chirping 'H'm, do you think so?' that was a habit of speech with him, he didn't attempt to defend himself in any way. 'H'm, do you think so?' he would say, and again, 'H'm, do you think so?' to the youth's severest strictures.

"At the end of the walk, as they were taking leave of one another, Jowett suddenly gave expression to his rage:

"'Good-by, Mr. Dash,' he said, slowly and quickly. 'You are, I think, the most conceited puppy that ever came to Oxford.'

"The young man, with an excellent imitation of Jowett's manner, answered:

"'H'm, do you think so?'"
